Red Chili Culinary Uses :

There appears to be a positive correlation between environment temperature and chili consumption: chilies are more popular in hot climates.

red seeds Most European countries do not use chilies for their traditional dishes; only Mediterranean countries and Hungary have much of a chili tradition, though food is rarely really fiery even in these countries. Consequently, there are only few particular chili cultivators in Europe. A good example is the fiery piri-piri, a Portuguese variety sold almost exclusively in pickled form. Other hot chilies are mostly used dried, e.g., the from Pays Basque in France, or the South Italian pepperoncino.

Most Chinese cooking styles, as a rule of thumb, avoid too much spiciness; especially Southern Chinese (Cantonese) recipes. In Central China (Sichuan and Hu-nan province), however, chilies and garlic are very popular and used in astonishing amounts. Dried red chilies are often fried in hot oil until dark brown, the oil then being used to prepare stir-fries. The local tien tsin chili is particularly suited for this high-temperature procedure.
